Re: Notice of Continued Infringement

Dear Renny, Patrick, Tim, and Brad:

As you know, over the course of the last five years, Sonos has alerted Google to its extensive infringement of Sonos’s patent portfolio on multiple occasions.

For instance, Sonos first raised the issue of infringement with Google in 2016, starting with an initial meeting in August 2016 and then continuing during a follow-up meeting in October 2016 where Sonos put Google on notice that it was already infringing at least the following Sonos patents:

Category	Patents ¹
Acoustic Signature	8,930,005 9,519,454*	10,051,397*
Coordinator Selection	9,288,596	9,654,545*

Despite this notice of infringement, Google only expanded the scope of its infringing products and features after those 2016 discussions. Sonos again raised the issue of infringement with Google in 2018 over the course of two meetings, one in January and another in July, where Sonos put Google on notice that – in addition to the 38 specific patents previously identified in 2016 – Google was now also infringing at least the following Sonos patents:

Category	Patents
Audio Calibration	9,219,460	9,872,119

	D796,447

Google again continued to expand the scope of its infringing products and features. In fact, by 2019, Google’s infringement had become so extensive that it was infringing at least 100 Sonos patents in the United States alone. This willful disregard for Sonos’s patents led Sonos to escalate the discussions with Google regarding its infringement, and in February 2019, Sonos provided Google with claim charts for 100 different Sonos patents that Google was infringing. These charts provided an element-by-element breakdown of Google’s infringement. Attached as Exhibit A is a listing of the 100 Sonos patents for which Sonos provided claim charts in February 2019, organized by category.

Even though Sonos demonstrated Google's pervasive use of Sonos's patented technology by providing these 100 claim charts, Google did not stop its infringement or attempt to negotiate a license for Sonos's patents in good faith. Thus, in 2020, Sonos was ultimately forced to bring patent infringement actions against Google at the U.S. International Trade Commission ("ITC"), in U.S. District Courts, and in Germany. The patents that Sonos has asserted against Google to date in these patent infringement actions are as follows:

Category	Patents
Audio Calibration	9,219,460
Direct Control	9,967,615 10,779,033	EP 3 554 005
Grouping & Synchronization	9,195,258	10,209,953
Multi-Channel Pairing	9,219,959
Setup	10,439,896
Volume Control	8,588,949
Zone Scenes	9,344,206 10,469,966	10,848,885

As you know, the German court recently ruled in Sonos's favor and issued a preliminary injunction that restricts Google from offering and/or supplying mobile devices, playback devices, and software in Germany that are suited and intended to carry out the patented method recited in EP 3 554 005. Sonos also remains confident about the strength of its ITC and District Court actions.²

Of course, the Sonos patents that were asserted against Google in these actions represent only a very small fraction of the Sonos patents that Google was infringing when such actions were filed. Yet, instead of curbing its infringing activity or negotiating a license in good faith, Google has only continued to expand its misappropriation of Sonos's patented technology since Sonos filed these actions by adding new infringing products and features to its line of Cast-enabled media players and corresponding Cast-enabled apps. The universe of infringing Google products and services now includes more than a dozen different "Cast"-enabled media players – namely, Google's Chromecast, Chromecast Ultra, Chromecast Audio, Chromecast with Google TV, Home Mini, Nest Mini, Home, Home Max, Home Hub, Nest Hub, Nest Hub Max, Nest Audio, and Nest Wifi Point – as well as corresponding Cast-enabled apps such as Google Home, YouTube Music, Google Play Music, YouTube, Google Podcasts, and/or the YouTube TV that have been installed on smartphones, tablets, and laptops (including Google's own line of Pixel devices) and back-end cloud services that interact with these Cast-enabled media players and apps. In addition, Google continues to support and encourage the use of third-party Cast-enabled apps with Google's Cast-enabled players that likewise infringe Sonos patents.³

² In contrast, the retaliatory cases that Google has filed against Sonos lack merit. In fact, Sonos has already eliminated U.S. Patent Nos. 7,065,206 and 8,583,489 from Google's U.S. District Court case and that the German court found that Sonos does not infringe European Patent No. EP 1 579 621.

For at least the same reasons that Sonos has previously articulated during the parties' meetings and memorialized in the element-by-element claim charts provided in February 2019, Google continues to infringe each of the more than 100 patents for which Sonos has previously given Google notice by (1) making, offering for sale, selling, importing, and/or using its line of Cast-enabled media players, (2) making, offering for sale, selling, importing, and/or using smartphones, tablets, and laptops installed with Cast-enabled apps (as well as inducing and contributing to such infringing activities by others), (3) making and using back-end cloud servers that interact with these Cast-enabled media players and/or Cast-enabled apps, and (4) making and using servers that host Cast-enabled apps for download (as well as inducing and contributing to the foregoing infringing activities by others).

As Google is also surely aware, Sonos's portfolio of applicable patents that Google infringes has grown significantly since Sonos provided its element-by-element claim charts in February 2019. For instance, Sonos has been awarded many additional patents in the same patent families for which Sonos had previously given Google notice, and Google has been and continues to infringe at least one claim of each of these additional patents for similar reasons to those stated above and memorialized in the element-by-element claim charts for the other patents in these previously-identified families. Moreover, since Sonos provided its element-by-element claim charts, Sonos's portfolio has grown to include patents in several additional families, and Google has been and continues to infringe at least one claim of each of these patents as well by (1) making, offering for sale, selling, importing, and/or using its line of Cast-enabled media players, (2) making, offering for sale, selling, importing, and/or using smartphones, tablets, and laptops installed with Cast-enabled apps (as well as inducing and contributing to such infringing activities by others), (3) making and using back-end cloud servers that interact with these Cast-enabled media players and/or Cast-enabled apps, and (4) making and using servers that host Cast-enabled apps for download (as well as inducing and contributing to the foregoing infringing activities by others). Attached as Exhibit B is a listing of at least 64 additional patents that also have been and continue to be infringed by Google, organized by category.

Please let me know if you have any questions or wish to discuss further. Also, if there is someone else that I should be in touch with regarding this matter, please let me know so that we can make some progress on resolving the parties' disputes.
